100 years ago, people listened to music on a gramophone. The music was on records that went round and round. Gramophones didn't work with electricity – they worked with a key you turned, like an old clock. The sound came from a large metal cone. Gramophones weighed a lot – more than 12 kilos!

In the 1940s, people listened to music on record players that worked with electricity. Record players had speakers and the records were vinyl. Vinyl was a special plastic for records.

Thirty years later, people also had cassette players. The cassettes weren't "strong" but they were smaller than records. The Sony Walkman® - a small portable cassette player with headphones – was also popular.

Then in 1982, CD players arrived in the shops. People bought more compact discs than cassettes. The compact discs were stronger than cassettes and the sound was better. Lots of people bought the portable Sony Discman with headphones and listened to their CDs outside their homes.

Nowadays we listen to music with headphones on MP3 players and smartphones. You can download songs to an MP3 player or listen to music on apps with your smartphone.

Vinyl records are popular again today, so ask your grandparents to find their old record players!
